To determine if high-resolution sonography can identify discrete sonographic features in the superficial fascia and surrounding tissue in patients with breast cysts that are indicative of a cyst wall likely to be more than 5 mm thick or with a complex appearance. Forty-one women with a mean age of 41 years with 47 breast cysts were examined. Four different features were defined in the superficial fascia: echogenicity, thickness, continuity, and complex appearance. Sonographic measurements were performed in the lesions. All breast cysts were unilocular. There were 23 (53%) cysts larger than 5 mm and 12 (27%) with a complex appearance. The mean thickness of the cyst wall was 3.5 mm. Twenty-two cysts (51%) had echogenic fascial septa, which was more common in large cysts ($P = 0.006$). Echogenic fascial septa were identified more frequently when the cyst was larger ($P = 0.002$). A thin echogenic fascial septum is more suggestive of a thin cyst wall than a thick one. A complex appearance of the cyst is not associated with a thickened cyst wall. High-resolution sonography is useful in identifying discrete features in the superficial fascia that can predict the thickness of the cyst wall. This provides additional information when sonographic follow-up is being considered for women with benign breast lesions.Voyager 2, the probe to the outer solar system, has a new problem: radio signals seem to be leaking from one of its instruments. What's more, it's just ahead of one of the most exciting events of the year — the closest approach to Jupiter that the spacecraft will make. As recently as Wednesday, the distance to Jupiter was about 26 million kilometers (16 million miles). It will decrease to just 24 million kilometers (15 million miles) by the end of the month, which is when the spacecraft will start receiving more powerful transmissions from Earth. That means the spacecraft will be receiving more energy than it is used to. Voyager 2 has been working at least one million times harder than it is expected to, so the scientists didn't expect to be able to keep doing that for long. However, since then, there has been a problem. The problem was first discovered by the SETI Institute on Oct. 6, the day after the nearest approach to Jupiter. On Nov
