After a history of dangerously careless and error-prone behavior, the Navy wants to retire its Osprey tilt-rotor aircraft fleetwide with a combination of safety fixes and unmanned aerial vehicles. The Navy's cost-cutting, fleet-wide Osprey retirement is expected to be operational by fall 2018. According to USNI News, the Navy initiated the Osprey retirement program in 2014. The upcoming retirement of the tilt-rotor fleet means that 10 of the Navy's 39 Osprey squadrons will be forced to shift from the Osprey to the MV-22. If successful, the retirement of Osprey squadrons will save $187.5 million a year, which will come back to the service after the retirement of the entire fleet. Chief of Naval Operations Adm. John Richardson has taken notice to the retirement of the Osprey. He told USNI News that cost-cutting is part of the Navy's "root causes" and can be found in the aftermath of the 2009 collisions of the Blue and Gold Fleet. He believes that the retirement of the Osprey fleetwide is the only way to manage Osprey retirements in the future. The final Osprey retirement is anticipated to be a safe one. Richardson added that safety has been the Navy's primary concern throughout the fleet's history. "If we're going to retire these aircraft, we're going to do it with all the aircraft when they're good and ready, and they'll meet all the safety criteria," said Richardson, who is the 30th commandant of the US Naval Academy. The Osprey fleet has made headlines for its dangerous record. According to reports, the Navy has recorded more than 50 deaths in its tilt-rotor fleet. That number keeps growing as more carriers continue to retire their Ospreys. The Navy declared the Osprey
