During the Middle Ages artists represented people, landscapes, and even the sky and the sun. They used carvings and geometric shapes in the stone to give their paintings a more realistic appearance. Usually a picture was made in a rock formation using a human figure as a model. Later, during the Renaissance, the development of etching techniques by famous German artist Albrecht Duerer and Diego Velázquez led to the rise of portrait, portrait and allegory as the three main types of stone painting. In the first centuries of Christianity art was often associated with pagan images. As a reaction to the fame of the Greek statues, the Christians went to the rock formations in Spain, Italy and Greece where they asked for protective symbols that would ward off evil spirits. The caves, which were the protector against the enemies, were the subject of cave paintings, some of which are the oldest pictures in the world. During the development of the Renaissance artists tried to reproduce the human body in its anatomical details, but in the early 16th century Titian gave a new life to the old tradition with his paintings. The advance of technology in the 20th century meant that artists could experiment with new materials such as metal and plastic. Artists could now paint figurative pictures to add to their portfolios. Since the end of the 19th century, the paintings made on stone were stopped for a while because it was thought to be too difficult. In the 1970s and 1980s, however, stone painting became a popular technique of painting that combines the element of realism with the simplicity of the technique. Painting on stone demands more skill than painting on canvases. Its techniques are more demanding than working on canvas and its time-consuming process demands more skill than most other methods of painting. In 1984
