Late last year, Apple took its foot off the gas pedal with its desktop iMacs. There were those who liked its radical, new design, but others were less-than-impressed. Two years ago, we first wrote about the awful grating, completely unintuitive design of the new 27-inch iMac. And a year ago, we detailed Apple's plans to reconfigure some of its computers, eliminating touchscreens and opting for slab-like look-and-feel. Apple has reconfigured iMacs again. In a round of out-of-cycle (and largely unwanted) refreshes, Apple took the wraps off of a new 27-inch iMac, the iMac Pro, and a refreshed 21.5-inch model, the iMac. And there's good news, bad news, and so on. The Good First up: The iMac. This is the bad news. Apple killed the Touch Bar on the iMac for good. And for some people, this is the bad news. Yes, this change means that we can all use touchscreens without our hands cramping. But you can still access touch functionality, with your eyes and Apple Pencil, if you're a right-handed writer, artist, or user. The change seems much smarter, in hindsight. The dual-screen design Apple had been working on for years has failed to succeed as a product. (We get it, the 21.5-inch model, with its outdated design, has failed to sell well.) But the reasoning behind the change doesn't make sense. In fact, there's a much better way to change this model of Apple computer that would help make the move a winner. It's dead simple: Apple should completely ditch the iMac's Touch Bar and move that space to the lower-left corner of the screen. Apple says that it wants to give users the choice of whether to use it or not. Instead of essentially killing the Touch Bar, which would force people to use it, Apple could create a full-fledged option to add a Touch Bar to the display. It could have a slider to enable touch or a switch to turn it off. We've been calling this feature, for years

Fibroblast-specific gene expression by replication-deficient recombinant human adenovirus type 5. The present study was undertaken to examine the therapeutic potential of a replication-deficient recombinant human adenovirus 5 (rAD5) to infect fibroblasts of various origins and the usefulness of this recombinant vector in gene delivery studies. Infection of human embryonic fibroblasts (HES) and pulmonary fibroblasts (HPF) with rAD5 resulted in a dose-dependent expression of the E. coli lacZ gene without any difference between the HES and the HPF. The rAD5-induced expression was inhibited by antisense oligonucleotides complementary to the E4 region. Transient expression of the rAD5-transduced chicken ovalbumin gene was demonstrated in the HES, HRE, and HPF. rAD5-mediated gene expression was found to be controlled by promoter elements within both E4 and the adenovirus promoter. Expression was also demonstrated for the fibroblast-specific genes, alpha 1 (I) collagen, fibronectin, and transforming growth factor-beta 1. Thus, rAD5 represents a useful system for the delivery and expression of both viral and non-viral genes in fibroblasts of various origins. Emerging drugs to treat HIV-associated neurocognitive disorders. HIV-associated neurocognitive disorders (HAND) affects up to 40-80% of all individuals with HIV and may be responsible for motor and cognitive impairment leading to significant long-term neuropsychiatric complications. Whereas HAND's clinical appearance may resemble many disorders, such as Alzheimer's disease, it is the result of HIV-related brain injury and can be considered as a spectrum of disorders rather than a single disease. Several therapeutic strategies are now being tested, with several
