Intro In this post I will show how to work directly with a database using DataFrame-like classes, and understand the implicit operations that happen for you. You can find an interactive version of this post here. Example Let's start with an example that can be found at the end of this post. We will work on a simple database with many salespeople, sales reports and a sales person's birthday. The screenshot below shows a bit of the raw database:

import sqlContext
Sales s = sqlContext.read.json("sales.json")
You can now execute queries on Sales like so:
Sales.sql("SELECT first_name, last_name, birth_date, sales_amount, state FROM sales WHERE id = 3").show().printSchema()

 Custom types In sql-mode, a SQL statement cannot use a Python data structure but only Standard SQL functions. However, DataFrame-like classes can be used as a type by defining its schema:

import sqlContext from pyspark.sql.types import *
class Sales(types.Schema, dtype):
    firstName = str().rename("first_name")
    lastName = str().rename("last_name")
    birthDate = DateTime().rename("birth_date")
    amount = float().rename
