Relationship between donor function and liver iron measurement by T2*-weighted gradient-echo imaging at 1.5 T in liver transplants. Liver iron measurement is important in the prediction of posttransplant liver function. However, there is no consensus regarding liver iron measurement. In particular, there is a lack of knowledge regarding the relationship between liver iron level and the quality of hepatocytes derived from the donor. In this study, the authors investigated the accuracy of T2*-weighted gradient-echo imaging for quantification of liver iron levels. Liver iron levels were quantified by gradient-echo imaging. To calculate the correlation between gradient-echo imaging and biopsy measurements, T2* values were measured by a 1.5-T whole-body magnetic resonance imaging system and were then compared with measurements obtained from biopsy specimens. T2*-weighted gradient-echo imaging offered a significantly higher sensitivity for the measurement of liver iron levels than T2*-weighted imaging (98% vs. 76%; P Raft concentration gradients drive early endosome uncoating in axons of Sch 6d1f23a050
